

I would like to urge the FCC not to implement any rules that would reduce the impact of Indiana's telephone solicitation law. I have been added to the no-call list in Indiana for several months, and have greatly appreciated the benefits. My family and I can enjoy meals and time together without annoying interruptions. We used to receive several telemarketer calls per day, and now receive virtually none. It frees up our phone line for important calls, and avoids the inconvenience of running to the phone, interrupting important work or relaxation time, only to frustratingly discover that it's a call from someone selling something we don't want. When we want to buy something, we do so. . . we don't need phone calls to our home to tell us what we want. Please, don't take away the privacy we've come to appreciate. Let our home be our castle!
